The Psychopath as a “pharmacist” and why they actually get hired

A covid-19 problematic

The psychopath's pandemic is just as big as the covid19 pandemic, in fact some even believe that psychopaths are the cause for the covid19, but how come psychopaths are becoming so common?

In the past psychopaths were under control and their migration was controlled, now they are the only ones who can migrate, as they are the only ones that are undetected, but this shift has occurred in the past 10 years, whilst before it was difficult for them to achieve any form of success. Also, we saw and experienced some professions had more psychopaths than others, we have noticed how common they are in the law enforcement field¹, but we hardly see the healthcare professional as a psychopath, and it is not as common, being that these professions require a high level of empathy. The law enforcement field does not have specific requirements, but the healthcare field does.

This paper describes the psychopathic pharmacist, self-declared "racist" or synonymously "racially envious" and "anti-social" against patients, doctors and scientists, but also against pharmacists, and selectively anti-social, exerting micro-aggressions, the same kind who gives you chills just by confronting you, as begins stalking you at a very early stage, but how come do pharmacists become targets of this other type of psychopath who somehow managed to get in such a delicate profession, whilst it was harder in the past for this to happen?

Firstly, 20 years ago, psychopaths all lived in certain areas and were segregated, because psychopaths attract like-minded psychopaths, as they began to move around the world, and around their nations, they rely on this lack of knowledge that people have, knowledge into their psyche and psychology in general. In those areas, it has always been that degrees are a given just based on references and not much based on skills nor knowledge. Still, there are incredible red flags that have been pointed out by many scientists in the form of anatomical hints that someone might be psychopathic, such as the white sclera visible at the bottom of the iris, not otherwise visible in “normal patients”, and indicates some form of brain damage from drug or alcohol consumption; moreover they look pretty unattractive even though some consider them charming, but their personality is nothing but a copycat of their victims whom they end up destroying and other people in their surroundings, that is why they are charming, the real personality is less than charming, and that surfaces sometimes quickly sometimes it takes a few months. But these “monsters” are socially accepted and even obtained a degree, nevertheless, it might have even been easy for them to obtain it compared to normal people who may even have the passion for the profession and worked hard for it. The main point is, these degrees were attained in areas where you could bribe professors in order to get a degree, and where the professors themselves might have been psychopaths as a result. Have you ever obtained a degree and noticed how hard it is and how misunderstood you are, when you study so hard and can hardly make it, because you don’t come from an extremely wealthy family or because your parents weren’t in the healthcare profession? Well, the psychopath is the type whose family has that, but the State justly should reward those that are not as advantaged, yet, it turns out it donates to these families. Psychopaths, are great at getting ahead, but their actions are illegal, and what they do is lie and play victim of the State, the State entrusts psychopaths, thus people from those very areas but doesn’t entrust people who are hardworking and whose parents aren’t pharmacists and thus really like the profession of pharmacist. In reality, by doing this, they automatically victimise real victims and make themselves perpetrators, because the State is there to protect us from these psychopaths in the pharmaceutical profession as it is there to protect us in general.

Behaviours that can be experienced by psychopaths that access the profession they are unsuited for.

Certainly psychopaths are callous, but the first day of interaction with the psychopath everything becomes a red flag. The practitioner who starts working with the psychopath is going to be coerced into breaking the law, in a way that no one else is coerced to, and the excuse is that the patient expects you to or that other practitioners do that too. The psychopath hates to learn anything new and therefore thinks in her mind that the only way to be successful is by breaking the rules, in general the first interaction is also with someone excessively rude and verbally abusive. They will try to push their “prey” to their limits and expect them to break the rules for them, which some even refuse to do, an example is asking the pharmacist to falsify a signature on the very first day at work. Other typical behaviours of the psychopath are the continuous threats of unfair dismissal, even if you have just begun, as well as abusive behaviours, stalking, badmouthing, humiliating the pharmacist and pretending they are making mistakes in front of the patients, as well as the same kind that people experience when are dealing with domestic abusers. Like the domestic abuser, in the form of a psychopathic flatmate, they always talk about their families, how large they are and how many problems they could cause you, and how untouchable they are and how they have “links” everywhere and in any country, they are in short real stalkers. Meanwhile the job offers stop coming in and people seem to appear scared of talking with the victim and more, isolating the victim further, it is yet, not surprising.

Red flags to the psychopath

The psychopath is in general incompetent, and doesn't have much knowledge, clinical or not, and thus might provide wrong advice, very quick in the first consultations, and is sure that it is not going to be a problem, as she has a lot of “back-up”. The psychopath is not a peaceful individual, but a stalker and a confrontational individual, is paranoid, prejudicial and suspicious and is unable to control emotions like normal people tend to do. The psychopath always pretends to have some form of disease that doesn't have, in some psychopaths we see how they pretend having mental illnesses, such as paranoid schizophrenia, in others we see them pretending to have Parkinson's disease, or somatic diseases, that they don't have, and that is why they suspect others lie about their own diseases and complain about people with real mental illnesses, such as anxiety. The disease is used to prey further on their target, as many people who suffer from these somatic and mental illnesses do not behave in this way, they are too busy suffering, also, it is not proven that people with illnesses lack empathy towards others, as we have experienced this many times on ourselves, when we were sick, we were suffering too much to be unempathetic towards other people and thus didn't have the time to abuse others. When someone is doubtful towards our pain, then we may be dealing with a psychopath or someone who has no empathy in general. Another main trait, is the lack of empathy which shows in their inability to read other people nor understanding others, and frequent apologies that are useless and repeated violations. They steal your salary, because of their sense of entitlement and it is not because they can't pay, they can, they refuse to as they claim because to them "workforce should be free" and they would rather use your salary for other purposes, even if they themselves have a mountain of capital that is not even their capital, but it often belongs to workers and to the people. They are not worried their victims might end up in trouble because of their actions, they don't care about others as human beings, they lack morals, understanding, empathy and thus emotional and general intelligence. Regardless of all their crimes and of the trails of victims they leave, losses and damages that they cause, they think they are the most wonderful and powerful people, and that is where we can notice the psychopath is self-delusional as somehow is not sickened by her or his own behaviour, but is "thrilled" and "excited". The psychopath torturing the patient or the pharmacist by consistently subjecting them to a constant feeling of threat, the threat of being fired and experiencing a loss, is just as threatening as someone threatening of assaulting others, it is exactly the same effect and the same form of psychological torture. The psychopath will only ruin the practitioner's life, they do not hire to help others, but they use them and then ruin them, because it's all they have ever done, all their lives, and the State allowed them to, so they learned it is their job to ruin other people's lives and cause unemployment which is costly for the State, but when are we going to hold them accountable? What is the point in giving someone a job and not pay them? The psychopath is anti-social, hates other healthcare professionals, particularly doctors, and spreads false rumours about doctors and lies, causing the patient to disrespect the doctor, and will also spread rumours and insult pharmacists in front of the patient to make the patient abuse and disrespect the real practitioner, the real pharmacist. The psychopath plays with the patient's mind, and lies to the patient about the best treatment, in fact the psychopath gives medicines without any logic, other than "I know him/her" and thus "I trust him/her". Prejudice is strong but it's what keeps them going, by spreading false allegations, their racist views, and hatred towards several types of people, the patients, doctors and accountants. It's how the psychopath gets ahead, together with the false "sob stories". The psychopath does not think about the consequences of their actions. The only way to deal with them is with the lawyer, because the psychopath won't leave the victim alone, and will continue to stalk the victim or prey for a long time, unless it is dealt with by the lawyer.

Psychopaths all have the same behaviours, it's almost as if they attended the same school of incompetence and ignorance, and the patient thinks if they are given what others don't give them, i.e. drugs without a prescription then they know better than the one who won't. Many times I have questioned the psychopath about their understanding of the laws, they do not understand them, they do not understand what malpractice is and they don't understand the danger of their actions, they pretend they are smart and know everything, but it is just routine tasks they repeat, and have not even mastered, as they are distracted, but they can do that, just repeat routines. A robot can do such routines, but pharmacy practice is much more complex than that. The pharmacy business is just "marketing" to them as they define it, you are "too much of a researcher, or too much of a clinician or have too many values or are too fiscal". You are told all this by the psychopath. The psychopath uses "sob stories" or the "Cinderella syndrome” to get hired, but this is not professional behaviour and this is not the sort of practice real pharmacists are used to. The psychopath really does believe is better than real pharmacists, because by giving drugs randomly they think, in their minds only, they have a talent. The psychopath does not pay your salary, doesn’t respect contracts, breaches and steals, because the State doesn’t check, the State relies and trusts on what the psychopath does, is very superficial and the psychopath is very critical of the State, not because is a real victim of the State, but because the State fails the victims of the psychopaths, but has done a good job at keeping psychopaths in places they shouldn’t be. Psychopaths act antisocial but they are not the same as people who suffer from antisocial personality disorders, so like the psychopathic police employee who doesn’t care about his or her duties of being an officer etc., so does the psychopath who somehow got in the job of pharmacy. Once more, the psychopath is the victim, not the real victim. Their parents were pharmacists so that justifies their behaviour somehow in some way. It is difficult to envision how a psychopath’s success is beneficial for the country, it destroys the country, the economy and the State itself, but experts who claim psychopaths are great for businesses, if that means stealing the worker’s money, perhaps, but in the end it is a crime, not a successful business anymore. A real successful business is led by a person who works hard and earns money, like the entrepreneurs, but a pharmacist is no entrepreneur, but if you misuse the service and the State’s laws and monopoly then that type of false pharmacist is a failed businessman and businesswoman too, as is not acting appropriately like the State expects them to. The psychopath will say that bad things happened to her or him and try to emulate trauma, but it is not real trauma, as post-traumatic stress patients do not ruminate about traumas many years afterwards, they forget those traumas, the “false trauma” is convenient to the psychopath, because the psychopath lacks empathy in general, therefore she or he couldn’t feel any traumas, and it is just one single trauma, nevertheless what does one single trauma have anything to do with the abuse they subject their preys to? It is a personal issue, and most likely, it hasn't even affected them as much as it affects normal people. Many people experience several traumas, but rumination is particularly strong in the first days or weeks from the incident, but it is not protracted through the years, as it is not pathological and is spontaneous and natural in normal traumatic patients, not artificial like it is in the psychopath. At last, the psychopath is very well connected and influential as a result, but it is difficult to grasp how these connections were made, perhaps by offering favours such as drugs without a prescription in exchange of other favours, it is hard to assume, but nevertheless the psychopath does not know you suspect them thanks to these back-ups and connections, that might even do certain favours to keep their victims quiet, which is why the solution is to speak with the lawyer, who might expose them as soon as those behaviours happen and not trust that the psychopath will not do anything against the victim, as they will act against their victims.

This long and objective analysis of the psychopath is to demonstrate that psychopaths are not "great" individuals, and that their stories are not real, and that the victims of psychopaths are suggestible to their stories, but none of them are true, and they do harm others. They can do many things, and it is time to begin believing the victims of psychopaths, and understand that real businesses are successful because they do not hire psychopaths, and not because they do. The psychopathic pharmacist will complain about providing Itraconazole ® for instance as an emergency supply due to the doctor being on holiday, because does not know the patient, but will find it easy to provide benzodiazepines without prescriptions. It is a tricky practice, indeed. Therefore, certain jobs are not compatible with psychopathy, as providing drugs without prescriptions, or stealing someone's salary isn't a successful business, it is a criminal business. Professionals should feel safe in their practice and not made to feel unsafe but being exposed to these businesses and it is the job of the State to fix these businesses not of the workers. The worker's scope is simply that of working, not of fixing a business that is not compatible with regulations and laws, and inspections should be frequent in understaffed pharmacies.

Unemployment should be solved by the State not by the worker, the worker merely works, but during the pandemic it would be easy for the criminal businesses to thrive compared to the honest businesses who follow regulations.
